noon to drain the submerged parts of the two cities.

Early in the day threats were made to cut the embankment, as the officials of the cities say that as long as the tracks remained the water had no means of escape. On learning of the intention of the citizens, officials of the Terminal endeavored to secure the services of the United States Marshal to prevent the action, claiming that it would delay the mails.

Before the Marshal could be notified, however, the embankment was cut. It delayed the trains but a short time, as a culvert was made to allow the trains to pass over.

A large force of workmen are still at work on the break in the east approach to the Merchants' bridge, and have so far succeeded in closing the gap so that traffic will be resumed over the bridge to-morrow morning.

The girl then lapsed into unconsciousness. This is the only coherent expression that hus been secured from the girl since the assault, and tends to confirm the theory of the police that the mother and two children were waylaid while driving along the road hear East Alton, and an attempt made to kill all three.

The boy, 5 years old, is still unconscious.
